And because I'm using a webview instead of using the Android app, I need to apply the android:theme to the layout of the webview. Is there a way for me to apply this theme to the whole application (the webview I'm using is non-ui)? What about if I'm using a shared element/service worker to communicate with other browsers? A: As far as I understand, you want to achieve something like this : or this : To achieve it, you should keep in mind the following : If you want to stay on facebook, you must use their SDK If you want to do it in a Webview, you'll be limited (because of the way Android handles WebViews) You'll have to use something like a WebViewClient The best method I could find is using a WebViewClient by setting the default WebViewClient to your custom WebViewClient, and handling the redirect to the Login page manually, and using the Facebook SDK to login. If you're using a WebView, you'll have to handle the HTML and JS yourself by handling the message you'll get when the redirected user is authenticated. It's not hard, but be aware that doing it this way will limit you. For example, you won't be able to use any JavaScript-based library. The good thing is that the WebView will handle javascript, so it will make it easy to make it work. To get an idea of how it looks like, you can use this WebViewClient :

public class CustomWebViewClient extends WebViewClient { @Override public boolean shouldOverrideUrlLoading(WebView view, String url) { if (url.contains("auth.login")) { finish(); return true; } else { return super.should
