The Sydney Opera House has embarked on a $1.1 billion renovation and restoration, much of which has been earmarked for the stage, after a four-year, $100m restoration of the box office saw it hailed as one of the best ever. The stage, the largest in the world, underwent a $60m restoration, with the most significant work being on its four propeller organ. “The beauty of the Opera House stage is the way that there is that sense of space and scale, and that allows the performers to be really actors,” the Opera House artistic director, Andrew Upton, said. “Everything is in scale, and there is a strong sense of weight; the bench on the floor is in proportion to people’s knees.” Upton was speaking ahead of the stage’s official opening on Tuesday. The Opera House performed the largest of its performances on the stage on Tuesday night, touring production of Crazy for You, which is based on the stage musical and stars Stephanie Szostak, as well as playwright and actor Daniel Evans as the composer Harold Arlen. The show was staged by Michael Rivers,

Director Michael Boyd, who oversaw the refurbishment of the box office, said the restoration of the stage had been an interesting process. "The thing I got so was how seamlessly the stage could be transformed, and how much you could do with it," he said. "For me the challenge was to find a sense of drama within the space of the stage, and to find some way of converting that into storytelling, which is what we are doing here with Crazy For You." Restoration of the Opera House was first announced by the NSW government in 2012, when it also revealed $113 million of the total planned $1.1 billion in works were set aside for the stage. A further $1.35 billion is budgeted for restorations and improvements. The final $100 million will be used to refurbish the existing stage. The nine-year project to repair and extend the stage was led by Boyd and the designer Jess Marshall, who, he said, "did a good job of retaining the strong identity of the stage". In preparation for the
